An Occurrence at Owl Creek Bridge

THE BOLIVAR EDITION OF THE COMPLETE WORKS 1909

I

A man stood upon a railroad bridge in northern Alabama, looking down into the water beneath. His hands were behind his back, the wrists bound with a cord. A rope encircled his neck. It was attached to a stout cross-piece above his head and fell away to the support of the left-hand pier. A rude plank floor, supported by beams projecting from the sides of the bridge, afforded standing room for him and his executioners. Separated from the latter by a few feet of space were two private soldiers of the Federal army, carrying their muskets at parade rest, and between them an officer in command. He was a captain. On a nearer support, against which his shoulder rested, was fastened the end of a long fuse. A lighted torch in the hand of a sergeant stood at the other end. Midway between the centre and the left end of the bridge a solider with a musket stood at the salute, motionless as the man whose life depended upon him.

Beyond the bridge the railroad extended in a straight line through a forest for a hundred yards, then curved out of sight around a wooded hill. At the farther end of the trestle could be seen a sentinel pacing upon the track, his back turned toward the spectators. He walked with a measured tread, as if upon his beat in time of peace, and at regular intervals disappeared behind the trees as he turned at the end of his post. The sun was shining brightly.

The man who was about to die kept his eyes fixed upon this sentinel as upon the one thing in nature that had power to move his heart. He was observing the interval required for the figure to pass from sight behind the trees and reappear. He counted the paces of the sentinel. He thought how superb a thing it was to live and how sweet to be permitted to remain for even a few minutes longer in the world. The intervals were long enough to permit of that. He would count a thousand paces between the disappearance and reappearance of the sentinel. He would count that many and then take his fate as it might befall.

He was a civilian. His age, his dress, his manifest refinement of manner all indicated that he belonged to the class of wealthy planters. His face was pale and expressive, but not that of a coward. Evidently he was no stranger to fear, but he was strong enough to master it.

He had no mind to count the paces. He knew not how many he had counted nor how many remained. He closed his eyes and heard a sound like the striking of a distant clock. It was the signal. He knew that the sergeant had stepped back and touched the fuse. He would not open his eyes. He would not look at the man who had taken his life. He would not look at the sky, but would fix his mind upon the sentinel.

Suddenly he felt himself falling through space. There was a terrific report, a blinding flash of light, a great volume of smoke. He was not dead. He was conscious of these things. He was falling, falling, falling. He was not conscious of any shock. He was simply falling.

The fuse had burned to the powder. The bridge was destroyed. The sergeant had fired the charge. The soldiers had carried out the sentence of the court. The civilian was dead.

The sentinel paced his beat. The sun shone. The birds sang. The water rippled. The trees waved their green foliage. The world was as it had been.

Peyton Farquhar was a well-to-do planter, of an old family and prominent relationships, who had been a slave-owner and was naturally an ardent supporter of the Southern cause. Circumstances of an imperious character, which it unnecessary to relate here, had prevented him from taking service with the gallant army that defended the Confederacy, but he did what he could. No service was too humble for him to perform in the way of aiding the South, no adventure too perilous for him to undertake if consistent with existing civil law, which he obeyed with perfect loyalty. Being a slave-owner and a planter of position and influence, he knew scores of men throughout the country with whom he was acquainted, and nearly all of them were engaged in some work variously designated, but all comprehensible as contributing to the Confederate cause. Among these acquaintances was one Carlin, a neighbor and former friend, who was now a colonel in command of a regiment of cavalry lying within his own county and state. With him Farquhar had frequently talked of the possibility of organizing a company of scouts to operate in the rear of the enemy, and this had finally ripened into a plan to destroy a railroad bridge, which, being a link of communication between two armies, was necessarily an object of importance to the commander of either. Carlin had taken a fancy to the undertaking, and had managed to communicate it to his superior officer and obtain authority for its execution. Thus it happened that Peyton Farquhar was now a servant of the Confederacy, but only in posse. He had not yet taken service in fact.

One day a stranger rode up to the plantation house where Farquhar lived and asked for a drink of water. This was easily procurable, for the spring was near the road. While the gratified traveler was drinking from a gourd the two men talked of the topics uppermost in the minds of well-informed persons of the time. The conversation proved mutually interesting. The stranger was manifestly a Southern sympathizer. Being questioned as to his name, business and destination, he frankly gave his name as John Wilson, said that he was a civil engineer, that he was traveling for his health (which appeared to be seriously impaired), that he had been engaged upon railroads in various parts of the South, and that at present he was interested in the railroad from Owl Creek bridge to Layhigh. He talked intelligently of the railroad system of the country, and Farquhar, who had been deeply impressed with the importance of the system to the Confederacy, was glad to learn that the bridge was strongly guarded. Wilson thought that it was, indeed, for he had seen sentinels posted all along the road. He had not himself been halted, but had been obliged frequently to identify himself and explain the character of his business.

Farquhar remembered Carlin's project, and the conversation soon turned in that direction. Wilson showed a knowledge of military affairs which seemed remarkable in a civilian, and Farquhar, who was deeply versed in the subject, was greatly impressed. Wilson's deductions were clear, his reasoning sound, his knowledge apparently exact. The two men spent an hour in discussing the matter, and part of the time they were overheard by a planter named Graham, who was also a civil engineer and lived in the vicinity.

When Wilson had ridden away Farquhar sought Graham and talked with him about the stranger. Graham had not heard his name, but knew who he was and highly approved of him. He said that Wilson was a valuable man to the railroad company, which was repairing the bridge and replacing the trestle-work with solid embankments, and that he had been sent down from the main office, in Memphis, to see that the bridge was properly guarded against attack by the Federal troops. Graham added that Wilson was a Northern man, but was said to be a good deal of a Secessionist, and was in full sympathy with the South.

Farquhar's interest in the stranger waned. He knew that Carlin's project was not a secret, and that Wilson's mission was entirely natural. He dismissed the matter from his mind.

As Peyton Farquhar sat that evening on the gallery of his home he observed a man approaching from the direction of the road. Darkness was coming on apace, and he could not clearly discern the object. He could see that it was a man, and that was all. Concluding that it was some one who had business with him, he walked down the path to the gate to meet the comer. As the latter unlatched the gate and opened it he said:

"Mr. Farquhar, I believe?"

"That is my name," was the reply. "You have the advantage of me."

The stranger, who was dressed in a suit of gray jeans, stained with clay, and wore a broad-brimmed hat, stepped inside the gate, which he closed behind him, and said:

"I am a Federal scout. You are within my lines. Consider yourself my prisoner."

Farquhar was astonished, but quickly recovered himself. He had no doubt that the man was telling the truth. He had known that the Federal troops were in the neighborhood, and had feared that they would make a descent upon his property. He had, however, no thought of offering resistance. He was a civilian, and his only weapon was a shotgun, which he kept for shooting crows. He was a man of quick intelligence, and he saw that the man before him was in a position to make him a prisoner or to kill him if he showed signs of hostility. He therefore said:

"I am glad to see you, sir. Will you not walk in and have some supper?"

The scout declined the invitation, but said that he would be glad to rest himself at the house for a few minutes. He then walked up the path, followed by Farquhar, and they seated themselves upon the gallery. The scout explained briefly that he was a member of a party of observation, that he had been sent out to picket the road, and that he had captured Farquhar because he had found him within the lines. He said that he was sorry to be obliged to do it, but that he had his duty to perform. Farquhar said that he was glad to have met a man who was so zealous in the discharge of his duty, and that he would do all in his power to assist him. He then called his servants and ordered them to prepare supper for the scout.

Supper was soon ready, and the two men sat down to it together. The scout said that he was sorry to be obliged to keep his men in the dark as to the movements of the troops, but that he would be glad to have Farquhar's company for a few hours, and that he would be obliged to detain him as a prisoner if he showed signs of leaving the house. Farquhar said that he would not do so, and that he would be glad to have the scout's men come to the house and get supper. The scout said that he would prefer to have them remain where they were, as they were very well where they were.

Farquhar then said
